If you think you can save money by installing an indoor TV outside, think again. Just look at the many reasons why a SunBriteTV is the only choice for outdoor video.

Why you shouldn't install an indoor TV anywhere outside (even on your porch)

Safety

Open the first page of any TV manual, and you'll see a section warning you about the dangers of putting an indoor TV outside. Besides the risk of electrocution, one small short, and your cheap TV can cause some pretty expensive damage.

Damage

If you think that indoor TV is safe under your patio, think again. Humidity, dust, and sunlight can all compromise the inner workings of your device.

Performance

No one wants to watch a picture with obtrusive glare or black spots, but that's what you'll be faced with when your TV isn't equipped for the outdoors.

Warranty Issues

It's simple: If you install an indoor TV outside, you're voiding the warranty. So if your picture goes out on the very first day, you're out of luck (and some serious cash).

Compromised Devices

A TV shock or short due to moisture can cause damage to other connected devices, which means more equipment you may have to replace.

Time

Don't bother rolling out and setting up a TV every time you want to be outside. With SunBriteTVs, they're installed once, and last for years.
